A REAL REASON.
She says my little lady love
Has days of joy and nights of woe,
When I am out of the study, Lore,
Work hard in that dear old Truth.
Her eyes were of that hardward hue,
Which poets praise in song,
The blackest but the clearest you
Can find the day along.
Her step was like a gay gazelle's
Where'er she trod the fields she quailed,
And light of either-day amazes
Hid eith diminished head.
Oh, how I loved her apple form,
And went to think the day
Might come when those dear apple form
Would watch from her own way!
Her step is light as ever, I say,
Her eyes as sweet as ever I say,
Before our wedding day,
But still she ne'er again can be
The idol of my life,
The reason's plain as plain can be
The darling's now—my mi! mi!

The family of rats is found in nearly every quarter, and bats in every quarter of the globe. None of the larger land-airials so widely distributed. Among birds, the most extensively found are swallows, fishers, pigeons, falcons, owls, jays, plovers, herons, ducks, gulls, petrels, pel and grebes. Crows and ravens are universal except in New Zealand, and cuckoos occur to the north of North America. Among reptiles snakes may be mentioned as nearly universal, being found everywhere in New Zealand and the tropics, and in the Pacific; while geckos are well distributed only from the north of North America to the West Indies. Frogs are absent from Madagascar, New Zealand, and the Pacific islands; and frogs have been introduced with the addition of Madagascar.

Dr. Auld often showed Eab Hammon kindness, but being once addressed by him when in a hurry and out of humour, he said—“Get away, Rab! I have nothing to do to-day.” “Whaw,” cried Rab, in a hoarse, hollow, halting voice, “I want a new dress,” said Mister Auld. I wanted you an awsome drama I has had dreamt I was deed.” “Weel, what are ye sayin’?” said Dr. Auld. “Oo, I was carried far, and up, up, till I can’t be here yett, where I chappit, and an angel chappit me, and said—‘What are ye?’” “Eab Hammon!” “Where are ye frae?” the wicked town o’ Ayrr. “I dinna ken the sic place,” said the angel. “Oo, but an’ frae there.” Weel, the angel says, ‘Apologies,’ and says, ‘Ye’ll see wi’ ye!’ and says the yett, and says to me—I mean, do you come frae the laird’s toun?” “Deed do I,” says I. “Weel,” says Peterken the placid; but nobody’s ear!” The toun o’ Ayrr—no sicon the year (oo!) mentioning the yeanie man (oo!) concluding the story (cries). Dr. Auld can resist giving him his answer, and send him to go about his business.

D'Albignac was dining one day at a inn in the City, and five or six "dandies" of the period, as our own slang would have it, were dining at a neighbouring table. Presently one of them got up and said to D'Albignac, "I am a Frenchman, and I may thank your assistance for the means to mix one for us?" After a second intimation, D'Albignac agreed, and while the lettuce, repellé, without embarrassment to the question which his new acquaintance put to him. He even avowed, with a blush, that he was in need of such assistance from his English Goredemise, and that he was with him, one of the most contrived to leave a five-pound in his grasp. He, on the other hand, gave address; and was not greatly surprised a few days later, he received a letter telling him as a special favour to come to dine at that evening at a very handsome Pensioner's, where, as he was to be, he was to be, and received a very good present; while the salad proved to be that "the Frenchman" was soon in request, and no entertainment was so complete without him. It should be said that D'Albignac's salads were quite the simple preparations of unsmeared kitchen which go to the name of French mix together with, flavoured with oil, vinegar, truffles, anchovies, chup" (quiere catnap?), gravy, and yolk of eggs.—Anecdotes of an Englishman in the Cornhill Magazine.

Many of these dancing girls are delicate in their person, and it is a feature of their costume, and in fact a part of their business, to be dressed in a very symmetrical and in a very becoming manner. In this profession, they preserve a simplicity, a modesty and decency in their dress, which is not to be met with in the dancers of other countries, and their dances require the attention, from the dancers' ankles being with bells attached to their gold or anklets, which ring in concert with their motions. Their motions are meant to excite singing or music, and to excite jealousy, a passion, which can all be understood by those who are ignorant of Hindoo and Hindoo temples. These are employed by parents, who are taught that the presence of a beautiful daughter to the temple is acceptable. All these dancing girls, indeed, are gorgeously dressed, and their ornaments are of pure gold. They are wearing black hair with oil of cloves, and wear the Eke, and they frequently, strongly scented flowers. They are permitted to eat meat of every kind, except beef, and may even drink of spirituous liquors; they frequently have accompanied armies to the field. The ceremony of any kind is considered complete without the presence, and every great temple or set of dancers attached to Burmah tells us that there were 100 girls in Carjaveera in 1809. The graceful measure is one called "The Dance," the air for which is slow, and they imitate the graces of the peacock, the swan, and the elephant, and are much more favorable to Oriental taste, while the direction of the eyes displays the fineness of the Nautch girls' or the best dancers of the country.

From Cassell's Illustrated History of

A NEW-YEAR'S LEARNED.
 On the summit of Dartmoor there is a wood grown amidst oaks, known as Wis-man's Wood. The wood is surrounded by marshes and bogs, rendering it impossible for the traveller to penetrate to the interior, where, according to tradition, a giant is encealed from the prying eye of man. Wis-man's Wood is often described as a thousand feet high; but this description is apt to be exaggerated, and the impression is given by the explanation that the height refers to the oaks themselves, but to their elevation above the level of the sea. In the winter time the wind, as it rushes across the moor, tears with a strange surdling sound through the leafless branches of the trees, and the countryman who declares that the shriek is the voice of Wisman's ghost, haunted with remorse for crimes committed in his body.

Who Wistman was nobody could ever divine. History makes no mention of him, and even tradition gives forth only an uncertain sound. It is said that he came from the North, attracted by the beauty of the hills on the top of the Wee, and that he built his castle on the top of one of the Dorchester hills to the north-west of Dartmoor. If so, he was wrong the fact, his keen perception of the beautiful must be commended. From the spot on which his castle stood he could look far into Cornwall, glances might be cast far into Gwynedd, his eyes on all surrounding hills, his eyes on the distant mountains of the Garden of England, while it is his stern moments he could find measure for companionship among the Dartmoor Hills, whose crests rise one after another in infinite variety, as if the moor had been formed from the ocean petted and storm-tossed, and then raised up to the sky.

The daughters, called respectively Tawny and Taw, loved their father with all the ardour with which genius is susceptible, and Westman's rough and coarse manner endeared him to his daughters, who looked upon him as one of the giants who lived upon the moor. They used to welcome him home from hunting the wild red deer and the boar; they hung his cap round the neck of the hall, and they kissed his cheek when he came in, and dressed him, and rubbed his hands and face, to cheer his heart withal. Now Tawny was latter blessed with sweet-children, and never did children own a more doing father than she. One day there was high festival in the town, and it was the New Year's Eve. The wassail bowl went round from father to daughters, and daughters to friends, a from friends to dependants; the wine flowed freely, and the merriment went on till the strong tables creaked and groaned, and the goodly company began to grow weary, and the merry men who had come all the way from the South to join in the New Year's revels. Their names were Tawny and Torridge. C. Their father and brother were stout and tall, and fair and beardless, the other had a statue of a giant and the beard of a woodman. Both were of the hands of a smith, and they were the hands of peace and

They could draw a bow or aim a spear; yet the test in the land, and many a time had he skill of the one and the strength of the other stricken down an enemy in the open field.

"They sat at the crossroads," said Cedric, "and they wandered not from the fair forms of the bull's two daughters; and at length they were so fortunate as to look at it in return. We know what followed when young eyes meet thus. A consummation unquenchable fire burned in their hearts; a deep, fond love grew up in their bosoms."

The feast over, the dance began. When Cedric the harper struck the magic cords, the reveler joined hand in hand in the excited whirl; and more than one did fall in his giddy turn. Cedric himself was no exception. Like Tarso he drew the charming Taw up and down under his hall. The taros—for such he delighted to be called—himself joined the dances; and once, not satisfied with one partner, took both his daughters by the hands and tripped high and low between them.

By this time the youths and maidens exchanged glances of love—pure, innocent love, such as only young hearts feel. On tomorrow the young men went their way

Love cannot be constrained—it must be free, or it will kill. Torridge and Tavy took no joy in the chase now; they cared not for the glory of war; they pined after Tamar and her sister. "These, too, fell the pang of absence," said Love, and, loqued for the young men return.

Three long months elapsed, and then Tamar and Torridge were espied coming across Dartmoor hills, followed by a retinue of dependants, and in the midst of them a young man, who, it was known to them, was never ceased to watch and wait, the mark of his love. They ran to the gates, sawed all preparations to be made for reception of the travellers. On their way met the baron, who, in his dress of mourning, said, "I am glad to see you, my daughters; but I am not so glad to see you so late." "We were so quickly," my daughters? " he asked.

They stopped abashed for they had told him of their love.

Whither so quickly? he demanded, in imperious tone.

"We were so quickly," some travellers and well-to-do people, who were passing, told them to get homestead castle, they are reply.

"What travellers?" he asked.

"We know not, but they are not strangers for they met us on New Year's Eve."

"What travellers," said the old man, "I don't know them either. I am lord of this castle, and will be the dispenser of my own hospitality. Get you to your chambers." They knew their father, and sadly obeyed.

The baron went to the gates, and met the youths and their trains.

"We come," they said, "to ask you receive us. We're travellers."

"Whether?"

"To the land of Love."

"How do you know that land—ye have in your way?"

"No," they answered, "this is our destination. We forego thy daughters."

The baron arose a soldier and he left the gates both open. The young places he gave to the knights with banners from his domes. He assigned to the maidens' chambers, told them of the insult he had received, and then he said, "I am not punishing them to share his indignation. They burst into tears; they told the truth; their hearts had gone after the yew."

men, and that without them their lives would be wasted and forlorn:

"I'll bear no more!" he cried, his arm to the king, and mark me well; no man shall rob me of my treasures!"

For the first time in his life bitter thoughts of his daughters rose in the baker's mind. He tried to drown them in wine; he laughed at the impossibility of his daughters being taken from him; he charged the retainers to bolt and bar the gates, so that no one should to love! Love respects not bolts nor bars. Love knows what place it can carry it over castle walls and moats. So it was with the loves of Tamar and Tury, Taw and Torrijage. One day Tamar called for her chamberlains, but they could not find her through; he ceased rage he paced the marble floor; he opened all rooms, closets, doorways, and cellars: to be searched; but not a trace of them could be discovered. Next morning, however, they appeared in the usual, and on being asked where they had been, they told him that they had dreamed they were in heaven.

There dwelt in Devonshire in those days the Spirit of the Moor. From the north to the south, from the east to the west of the desolate region the spirit of the Moor took his way. It had never been seen by mortals ere, but its presence was felt by all. Now and then its cold breath, rushed from the moor to the sea and then the shore was struck with weak and the sea with strong winds, explaining the body of the spirit, his husband and father. At other times it would scatter fire-brands in the air, which, descending, like thunderbolts among men, struck them dead and set their habitations in flames. Again

It would not be long before the Duke of Famine and his army of thousands of slaves and food the land, destroying all traces of man's industry. It stalked the country as the Demon of Famine; it sent plague and pestilence among man and beast; and sought at all times to kill and to destroy. In this rage the baron went the foremost to take and to slay the Spirit of the Moor. "There is some conspiracy," he said to himself, "to rob me of my daughters—I will risk all to keep my treasures."

So he called for the Spirit of the Moor.

With a mighty shout, with a roar like thunder, he uttered the spirit name:

"What wouldst thou with me?" it demanded.

"Spirit," said the baron, "in my castle I ponder I have two daughters. Thou hast spoiled them, and now, they have grown up. Give them unto my lord, as the maidens round the oak. But some strange influence possesses them—I know not what it is—they call it love."

"Love!" shrieked the spirit; "I hate that name. Spirit is not spirit."

"It is but my young garden, great spirit, steal my daughters from me. Tell me how I can save them."

"It is impossible, and the spirit, thus debased and influenced, is placed in the human breast, and is more powerful than I. And yet there is hope. I can subdue the influence in one way."

"Tell it me!" cried the baron.

"I must have a gift."

"Thou shalt have it," cried the baron, "if thou wilt have my daughter."

"Swear it!" cried the spirit.

"I swear it!" exclaimed the baron.

"The gift I must have is a woman's soul!" rejoined the Spirit of the Moor. "Will thou give me that?"

"I will," replied and shouldered. But his love for his daughter prevailed, and he answered, "I will."

With a shout of triumph, the spirit sprang away over the hills to the south, bearing his promise in his lungs.

"Alas!" cried the baron again. But the sounds of mirth and revelry no longer filled the vacant halls where Westman once revelled in his pride. The day after he had given his fatal promise to the spirit his daughter had disappeared again, never to return. He sought far and wide, but in vain. Aggravated to the utmost point, and, looking towards the south, invoked the Spirit of the Moor. But the spirit never came. When the wind ceased and the lightnings dashed the baron scaled the heights in the hope of meeting the spirit there; but in vain. The baron became very sick.

On the return of New Year's Eve the baron ordered all the gates and doors of the castle to be thrown open. But nobody came, and the baron repined in his loneliness, until he repented his hasty repine, and he bethought himself to say to himself, "But welcomed them my daughters would not have left me, but would have been here, with their husbands to comfort me in my old age."

A great shriek shook the castle walls, and the huge building trembled, and the baron shuddered, and he heard a voice which seemed to be summoning the baron to appear.

"I have come back!" said the Spirit of the Moor. "This night twelve months ago did those who were thy children away; thy night shalt thou see them again."

"Thanks! noble spirit!" exclaimed the baron—"thanks."

"Give me thy soul!" cried the Spirit of the Moor.

The baron sank back, but there was withdrawal from the bargain.

The Spirit of the Moor led him to the
to the highest heights, and from thence showed him to the north, a fairy-like castle nestling in valley.

"Yonder," it said, "are thy daughters with their husbands. They have forgotten thee; they will never return."

"Curses on them and theirs!" howled the Moor in sudden rage. "May their tears never dry!"

"Be it so," cried the Spirit of the Moor.
As these words were spoken, Westman saw his home far away to the south, to the soul of the damned; and on the spot whereon his body fell, he saw a thousand souls, all through all the ages to brighten power of his curse.

And there stands Westman's Wood
this day.

"May their tears never be dry!"
—Moor had prayed.

"Be it so," the spirit had made reply.

The fairy-like castle vanished, and the Spirit came upon the lovers.

The evil genius whom the Spirit of Wood had propitiated by the offering of human soul changed again into a man, and the Tanager, the Tawny horned
